fancy. It disclosed its giories once again at Carnegie Hall last night. Doubtless there are substantial reasons shy this orchestra should come to New York, but these reasons must be sought in the Western metropolis. Here must lovers cherish the delusion that they have a rich harvest of orchestral perfermance.

But setting aside this question, there are artistic grounds for welcoming the players from Minneapolis. It is good to know that the people of that city continue to love orchestral music and that they can hear it interpreted by so praiseworthy an organization. There is much to admire in the performances of Conductor Emil Oberhofter and his men. The orchestra is not one of the foremost in this country, but it has certain excellent qualities.

Among them may be enumerated its precision and its carefully crescendi and diminuendi, its special presiston and diminuendi, its bold and at times brilliant attack and its elasticity in the larger elements of style, if there is a want of color and transparency in the general tone it can be said that the balance is generally good. The orchestral numbers on last evening's list were the "Jubilee" from Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Rachmanidia Claussen, mezzo soprano, was the soloist. She was heard in Margit's ballaid from Steinhammer's "Feast at Solbaus" and the Hebestod from "Tristan and Isoide," which was as usual introduced by the prelude.
